

Web Usability Intern

Langoor is a non-usualist digital media agency which primarily works on online media (graphic and website development). We are an organisation with passion for being the change necessary in the online arena.

Currently, we are seeking an intern (preferably an engineering or a computer science student) interested in a online usability based project for 12 weeks. By the end of the project, the student will have produced a report on the current usability strengths and weaknesses in the 'website building' arena. The Intern will be compensated $2,000 at the end of the project. The project details will be provided to a short-list of applicants. The student will directly work with and report to the Managing Director and will gain usability engineering (online), research, team-work and self-learning skills. All interested applicants should apply to jobs@langoor.com.au with 'Web Usability Intern' as the subject line, their CV and four lines about why they are interested in this position. There will be an interview following which the Intern will start work at our Darlinghurst office from December 1, 2009. Possible full-time graduate job in 2010.
